

Opening Flowers

Nature illuminates Oneness and draws us inward. It is a place of peace.

Flowers are purposeful, organized, beautiful, and short-lived. Their function is to propagate. They lure pollinators with color, fragrances, and nectar, having “tricks” that get the job done for them AND their helpers. The relationship of flower to pollinators has changed through evolution, each interrelating with the other, changing form to become better at what they do.

Symbolically, each of us is like a flower. We are purposeful if we listen to that inner spark of Divinity, become conscious of our motivations, and develop our gifts to get our needs met and those of others. We are organized to give ourselves to the Greater Good if we choose. Each of us is a unique expression of beauty.

At this time of my life, I ponder about the passing of Life. I look back on it with gratitude. Each moment is precious and full of information, even in times of hardship. We are each asked to bloom into the fullness of our Being.

It is in that sense of Life that I have chosen to share these flowers, real and imaginary.
